Not illustrated. 1896 Excerpt: .the younger men are inclined to designate as peculiarly the quality of their elders. Then the earnest seeker for growth must study the beautiful in all its manifestations, for beauty is a fundamental necessity of good architecture. I do not mean merely the beauty which finds expression in stone and brick, and iron and brass, but also the beauty which lingers round the setting sun, which paints the lily or adorns the rose, which gives its subtle charm to Rosetti's poems, or crowns with glory the canvas of Chavannes. The subtle, aesthetic sense which makes life enjoyable, the beauty of form, of face, of thought and action, all reflect directly upon the beauty of architecture, and the man who is keenly alive to the one is most apt to bring out the other in his work. And still in the line of studying the beautiful,...
