At present, its adherents, all told, barely exceed six hundred thousand. Fifty years ago the figure stood much higher, but emigration to the United States and the British Colonies has done much, in the long interval, to thin its ranks. Its history, therefore, may naturally be supposed to be lacking in the interest that attaches to sections of the Church of Christ, whose membership is immeasurably greater, and whose Christian work presents much larger proportions. Yet, such a supposition would be hardly just, and when closely and carefully examined will be found to be scarcely tenable. There can be no doubt that the Presbyterian Church in Ireland has proved itself to be, to that country, the greatest blessing with which it has been favoured during the last three hundred years. It has given to it in its purest form the truth, from which springs the righteousness that exalts a nation. It has always been careful to instruct the people who worship at its altars in Christian doctrine and morality; and, with this great end in view, it has looked carefully to the training of its ministers, given to the ministry of the Word a prominent place in its church services, and made special provision for the religious teaching of the young.
