Some four years back there appeared in Punch a picture somewhat of the Corsican Brothers order. This picture, as far as I remember it, consisted of a lady sitting in her drawing room in England, and looking at the part of the room where one would expect to see the wall, but where instead she sees projected into space her daughters playing lawn-tennis in India. Puns, no doubt, regarded this picture as a sort of philosophers dream; but it at once occurred to my colleague, Professor Perry, and myself, then in Japan, that we really had the means in our power of realising this dream. For, when a galvanic battery sends an electric current through a piece of selenium, the current, as was discovered by Mr. Willoughby Smith in 1873, is increased by allowing light to fall on the selenium, and...
